Institute Rules

The face of architectural practice in New Zealand is constantly changing. One of the roles of Te Kāhui Whaihanga New Zealand Institute of Architects (the Institute) is to ensure its members remain current and up-to-date.

In order to be admitted to Institute Practice membership, a practice must:

- 1. Strive to ensure that they are competent to deal effectively with duties undertaken and maintain and extend their competence. This is an important component of the Code of Ethical Conduct for Registered Architects of the New Zealand Registered Architects' Board (NZRAB), nzrab.org.nz, the body whose requirements must be met in order for anyone to use the title "architect" or "registered architect".
- 2. Have architecture as their core business or a core component of it and a Principal will be an Institute member. While the practice may be multi-disciplinary and employ non-architect professionals, our requirement is for a Institute Practice to have a specialist architectural focus to ensure that a client's project receives the proper, professional attention that it demands.
- 3. Ensure that all its Architect Principals are Institute Architect members and all architectural work will be the responsibility of an Institute Architect. This requires that the Principal takes ultimate responsibility for all architectural work of the office. Clients can be assured that their work is in the hands of someone who is bound by the NZRAB's Code of Ethical Conduct for Registered Architects.
- 4. Undertake continuing education and training. A mandatory and comprehensive continuing professional development programme is offered to all registered architects, strengthening the skills of the profession and which contributes to a quality built environment. A variety of topics is addressed and can include aspects of design, technology, building and consumer law, quality management and contract documentation.
- 5. Accept peer review in the event of a complaint which has been upheld by the NZRAB. From time to time the NZRAB receives a complaint from a contractor or a client about an Institute Architect member. Complaints are taken seriously by the Institute and also regarded as opportunities for more effective communication and education.

Every practice in this directory has signed a declaration accordingly that commits them to these principles.

Choosing an architect from the directory

The Institute website (nzia.co.nz) offers helpful advice in selecting and working with the right architect for your project.

When you first consider using the services of an architect, you are from the outset advised to ensure that the person you consult is, in fact, qualified.

A multitude of professional and occupational groups offer (or claim to offer) architectural and design services. However it is illegal in this country, for anyone to call themselves an architect unless they are registered as such by the NZRAB. Registration is earned through a combination of academic qualifications, considerable practical experience, and rigorous examination. Only when a very high standard has been reached are practitioners recognised as possessing the necessary level of knowledge, technical competence, responsibility and integrity to practice an architect.

This directory is an excellent place from which to begin your search because you can be certain that every Architect Principal of the Institute Practices listed is fully qualified and registered.

The added value of using an Institute Practice

An architect provides a client with vision, design skill and professional expertise. These are appealing concepts. They also deliver tangible benefits.

Architectural vision is the ability to visualise opportunities and options and to explore the potential of a site or brief. From there, architects apply their design skill to translate the client's aspirations into three-dimensional form. This is a unique and extraordinarily valuable set of skills, the product of extensive training and day-to-day experience in a complex industry.

Vision and design skill are complemented by architects' professional approach. Unlike many other building industry professionals, architects possess a broad range of skills across a diverse range of disciplines such as project development, cost analysis, contract management and space planning. While design may rightly be regarded as their core skill, architects are trained to take an overview of the entire building process, from pre-design through to project management and post-construction. No other professional can offer such a comprehensive service.

No architect will claim detailed knowledge of all specialist building disciplines. What they do possess, however, is the ability to recognise when that specialist expertise is needed in a project and to act accordingly. A major part of the architect's role is co-ordinating and integrating the contribution of other building professionals (engineers, quantity surveyors, building contractors etc.) into the project delivery process.

Institute Practices are committed to developing their skills in the interests of delivering good architecture and providing value to clients and to the built environment.

Institute Practices have access to a wide range of valuable resources offered by the Institute including professional development programmes, key documents such as the “Standard Conditions of Contract” and “Agreement for Architects Services”.

A person who decides to use one of the practices listed in this directory won’t necessarily pay more for their building than he or she would have otherwise. But it is highly likely that the end result will represent substantially greater value for money. A mediocre building built cheaply is money wasted. A building based on a thorough analysis of client needs and design options, by a professional trained to see and realise all the possibilities, is likely to provide lasting satisfaction.

This applies equally whether the project is new office space, building a new warehouse, or developing a shopping centre.

As a client, the result may be something you never thought possible, but which you realise you wanted and needed all along. Not only have you achieved value for money, you also have good architecture. This is precisely what Institute Practices, with their combination of technical expertise, design skills and management competence, are uniquely placed to deliver.

Using this directory

All practices are listed alphabetically according to geographic regions. There are eight geographic regions across Aotearoa New Zealand (right). The following information is included for each practice as appropriate:

Practice name, address and contact details

The Principals or Partners who are architect members of Institute are listed for each practice in the office in which they are based. In some instances, such as where there is a ‘branch’ office or similar, the name given is that of a non-resident Principal.

The letters ANZIA/FNZIA/DFNZIA denote Architect/Fellow/Distinguished Fellow of the New Zealand Institute of Architects Inc. The letters PPNZIA denote Past President.

In most instances the Institute Practice has made a short statement to describe the Practice.

In considering any of the listed practices, further information can be sought from them on skills, experience and qualifications and on the work they have undertaken for their clients to date. You should also check out the Institute’s website for more details.
